NOT YET TOLD IN FRANCE'S CAPITAL

Waters of the Seine Are Still Rising and the Roll of Death Continues to Grow.

PARIS, January 28.—The tale of horror in France's stricken capital continues to grow. The situation is steadily getting more desperate and none can tell what the end will be. More and more appalling grow the losses in life and property and the pitiful army of the homeless is reaching staggering proportions.

It is estimated that between 100,000 and 150,000 unfortunates have been driven from their homes. These folk are being forced from one place to another as the rising floods are steadily encroaching on the higher levels. It is conservatively estimated that 15,000 laborers are idle and without means to support their families. How many are dead none can say.

Many historical buildings have been totally destroyed or so seriously damaged that there is but small hope of saving them. Art treasures of priceless worth have been lost and buildings intimately connected with France's glory are crumbling before the onrush of the ravenous floods.

Brief Respite.

At noon yesterday the Seine had ceased rising, and it was thought that the worst was past, but a few hours later the horrified watchers saw the tide steadily mounting up the gauges horror had not yet been told.

The business of the public departments is at a standstill. The foreign office has been abandoned, the waters having driven the attaches from the buildings.

Already the water in the basement of the Louvre has reached dangerous depths. The Palais Mazarin is flooded. The walls of the buildings have so far resisted the floods, but none can tell at what moment they will give way.

The Isle du Palais, the ancient city of Paris, is under water. The basement of the church of Notre Dame is flooded. The walls of the Palais de Justice are
